If you breastfeed, you don't know how much breast milk your baby is getting each time they nurse. If you're not going to put them to the breast for feeding, how do you know how much breast milk to put in a bottle? Here's how to figure it out. You want to make sure that you're not overfeeding your baby when you give them a bottle. Here's a 3-step calculation that can help you figure out approximately how much breast milk your baby should take at each feeding. Your baby's weight in pounds $\times 2.5 / 8 =$ Ounces of breast milk per bottle. If you are using milliliters rather than ounces per bottle, multiply the result by 30. One pound equals 16 ounces (don't forget to add those extra ounces). To convert the extra ounces into pounds, divide the ounces by 16. For example, if your baby weighs 8 pounds 4 ounces, this equals 8.25 pounds. If you are using kilograms, multiply your baby's weight in kilograms by 2.2 to get their weight in pounds. Using the example above, a baby weighing 3.74 kilograms converts to 8.25 pounds ($3.74 \text{ kg} \times 2.2 = 8.25$ pounds). Experts recommend 2.5 ounces of breast milk daily per pound of body weight for babies up to 10 pounds. Take your baby's weight in pounds and multiply that number by 2.5 ($8.25 \times 2.5 = 20.6$ ounces). This figure represents how many ounces of breast milk your baby should be getting in one day. Based on the example above, the baby should be taking in about 20.6 ounces of breast milk in a 24-hour period. Finally, take the total number of ounces per day and divide it by how many feedings your baby will get in one day. A newborn or young infant should be eating at least every 3 hours (eight times a day). Take the number you calculated and divide it by 8 ($20.6 / 8 = 2.6$ ounces). If you prefer to use milliliters, remember that one ounce = 30 ml. In this case, the baby should be getting approximately 2.6 ounces $\times 30$ (or 78 ml) of breast milk at each feeding. You can put 3 ounces (or 90 ml) of breast milk in the bottle to feed a baby who weighs 8 lbs 4 oz (3.74 kg). The first day or two after birth, your baby won't get much breast milk since you're only producing a small amount of colostrum. That said, any amount of colostrum that you can pump and give your baby is beneficial. Between the second and sixth day, your milk production will increase. Your newborn will probably take about 2 to 4 ounces every three to four hours (14 to 28 ounces per day). From 2 to 5 months of age, your baby will take an average of 5 to 7 ounces every four to five hours (25 to 26 oz of breast milk each day). These calculations are just an estimate of the amount of breast milk that your baby should be getting at a minimum of every 3 hours. Some babies might be interested in taking more. As your baby grows and gains weight you will need to adjust your calculations. You will also need to adjust the amount of breast milk that you put in a bottle when you increase the time between feedings. For example, if your baby goes from taking a bottle every 3 hours to every 4 hours, you will need to increase the amount of breast milk in each bottle. If your baby was taking between 3 and 3 1/2 ounces every 3 hours (eight times a day), adjust the amount of breast milk in the bottle to approximately 4 1/2 ounces every 4 hours (six times a day). If you have any questions or concerns about your baby's feeding schedule or nutritional needs, talk to your pediatrician. If you will be collecting and freezing your breast milk to bottle feed your baby, it's better to store your milk in 2- to 4-ounce portions. This is especially true when your baby is younger and not taking large amounts at each feeding. Storing breast milk in smaller amounts prevents waste. It's easy to thaw an extra 2 ounces if you need it, but if you thaw and warm a container with 6 ounces of breast milk and your baby only takes 4 ounces, you'll have to feed it within two hours or throw the extra away. Once your baby gets older and is taking more at each feeding, you can store larger amounts in each container. Thanks for your feedback! What are your concerns?
